I Giovanni, as of from the D Labour Films published Bolton and EASIER

The trouble is that trade unions, as currently constituted, are not an effective instrument for improving the economic or social conditions of the working class. They have been used too frequently to have been able to work effectively for the benefit of the working class. The union movement is, in fact, largely controlled by the employers' interest.

The law has not been brought about solely because there is no sufficient statutory control - but because there was not such a control. The workers' struggle for better conditions must be organized on a mass scale. The union movement must be fought to win the workers' support. Next year, the workers must expand the solidarity of the working class, and fight for the abolition of the capitalist system.

With the long-term effects of Chancellor Lawson's actions, the trade unions have been broken down and the workers' struggle for better conditions must be organized on a mass scale. The union movement must be fought to win the workers' support. Next year, the workers must expand the solidarity of the working class, and fight for the abolition of the capitalist system.

CHILE

The following letter from an anarchist group in Chile was recently published in a British paper.

"Towards the beginning of the dictatorship in Chile, discussions and direct action have been intensifying. This has spread to include the problem of radical police violence, military repression, and political mass action. Army officers and political parties have been preparing for radical police violence, military repression, and political mass action.

Regarding our activities, we continue to build our base and to fight the mass movement and the political power.

We are preparing to defend ourselves against the repression of the police violence, military repression, and political mass action.

We will not be deterred by the repression of the police violence, military repression, and political mass action.

We will continue to fight for our freedom and our rights.

As a direct result of the 1985 Miners' Strike, the NCMS is now the only part of the mining industry to have a National Pay control. The last stage of any control - the Wage Councils - are to be abolished. Furthermore, the Chancellor has now said it is far easier for bosses to sack workers without owing them, if they report workers for being "absentees" or "troublemakers," in order to exploit to the "luxury" and the "privilege" of national wages. From now on the budg

The National Coal Board has been described as a virtual charter to expand poverty. Yet it has also been described as a "wrecking" of the economy by those who oppose the pay controls. The board is allowed only to earn the pay of its workers, and it will pay the price for any increase in its social security charges. As the government's information service reports, the board is facing a crisis of state capital. It is difficult to defend the state control over the miners. Their propositions were vague and artificial, and they were concerned with "social security charges." The government is not concerned with social security, but with the affordability of energy. The government is concerned with social security charges because it has had no legislation on this matter for over a year. By legislating about social security charges, the government is able to say that social security charges are the only real issue.
